What does impairment mean in our regulatory proceedings?

The Fitness to Practise Committee must decide whether a professional's fitness to practise 'is impaired'¹. Impairment is not defined in the legislation. However, over the years there have been many legal cases which have developed the concept of impairment and the factors that should be considered when deciding whether a professional's fitness to practise is impaired.

The question that will help decide whether a professional's fitness to practise is impaired is:

“Can the nurse, midwife or nursing associate practise kindly, safely and professionally?”

If the answer to this question is yes, then the likelihood is that the professional's fitness to practise is not impaired.

Before the Committee decides whether a professional's fitness to practise is impaired, they will have to make decisions on:

- what facts they find proven; and
- whether those facts prove the charges against the professional

Will a finding that some or all the charges are proven always result in a finding of impairment?

No. The Fitness to Practise Committee's role is to consider whether the professional's fitness to practise is currently impaired. It's not the aim of fitness to practise proceedings to punish a professional for past events. Fitness to practise proceedings are a way for us to establish whether the professional is able to practise kindly, safely and professionally. There might be many situations where something that the professional did in the past gave cause for concern, but the Committee is satisfied that those concerns have now been put right. If the professional's present way of working no longer raises concerns, such as those based on the safety of people receiving care or in the public interest, then the likelihood is that they can practise kindly, safely and professionally. This will mean their fitness to practise is unlikely to be impaired².

What factors are relevant when deciding whether a professional's fitness to practise is impaired?

A decision about whether a professional's fitness to practise is impaired is always dependent on the individual circumstances surrounding each concern. The Fitness to Practise Committee will look at a range of different factors. A decision about impairment will very rarely be based on one factor alone. Rather, a holistic approach will be taken so that anything that's relevant is considered.

FtP Committee decision making

A large part of the assessment of whether a professional's fitness to practise is impaired will involve considering both:

1. The nature of the concern

Consideration of the nature of the concern involves looking at the following factors:

Whether the professional has in the past acted and/or is liable in the future to act so as to put a person receiving care at unwarranted risk of harm

Fitness to practise is about managing the risk that a professional poses to people receiving care or members of the public. When making a decision on impairment, the Fitness to Practise Committee will consider whether people receiving care were harmed or put at risk of unwarranted harm. The Committee will also need to consider whether there's a risk of unwarranted harm to people receiving care in future³. This includes considering whether the concern suggests there may be an attitudinal issue such as displaying discriminatory views or behaviours.

Where any previous harm or previous risk of harm has been appropriately addressed by the professional, and any risk of future harm is remote, this could favour a finding of no impairment depending on the other circumstances of the concern. However, where a likely risk of harm to people receiving care exists, a finding of impairment will always be required.

Whether the professional has in the past breached and/or is liable in the future to breach a fundamental tenet of the profession

The fundamental tenets of the nursing, midwife and nursing associate professions are standards which are outlined in

The Code

. The Code is structured around four themes:

- Prioritising people
- Practising effectively
- Preserving safety
- Promoting professionalism and trust

In deciding whether fitness to practise is impaired, the Fitness to Practise Committee will need to consider whether any part of the Code has been breached or is liable to be breached in the future. Any breach would be considered alongside other relevant factors. Not all breaches of the Code require a finding of impairment but where a breach of the Code involves breaching a fundamental tenet of the profession, the Committee would be entitled to conclude that a finding of impairment is required. The finding of impairment would be required to mark the profound unacceptability of the behaviour, emphasise the importance of the fundamental tenet breached, and to reaffirm proper standards or behaviour⁴.

Whether the professional has in the past acted and/or is liable in the future to act dishonestly

The Code states that professionals must act with honesty and integrity⁵. Dishonesty can take many different forms, including:

- breaching a professional duty of candour to be open and honest when things go wrong,
- covering up or falsifying records,
- obstructing, victimising or hindering a colleague, member of staff or the public who wants to raise a concern,
- encouraging others not to tell the truth, or otherwise contributing to a culture which suppresses openness about the safety of care.

More information can be found in our guidance on

dishonesty

Context of the error/conduct involved in the concern

When considering whether the proven charges amount to impairment, the Fitness to Practise Committee will consider the context in which things have happened. There are three areas of which will be important for consideration.

Two areas of context are directly linked to the reasons why proven events occurred. These are:

- Personal factors relating to the professional
- The professional's working environment and culture

These areas are important for the Fitness to Practise Committee to consider because they may have adversely affected the professional's ability to practise safely and professionally. By the time the Fitness to Practise Committee considers impairment, where these contextual factors no longer exist or they have been appropriately managed, the professional might be able to demonstrate that they are currently able to practise kindly, safely and professionally.

The third area of context is the learning, insight and steps the professional has taken to strengthen their practice. Where we have evidence to suggest that a professional cannot practise safely and professionally, we will communicate this to the Fitness to Practise Committee. Where the professional disagrees, they can influence the Fitness to Practise Committee's decision by providing any information that would suggest they have taken steps to address any concerns or risks. For example, the professional may wish to provide:

- evidence of further relevant training or supervision
- information relating to reflection and understanding of the issues raised in the proven allegations
- insight regarding the proven allegations
- details of steps taken to address the concerns raised by the proven allegations
- evidence from others as to current skills and fitness to practise

For further information, please see our guidance on

insight and strengthened practice

It is important that we're aware of any relevant information as early as possible, to assist with suitable resolution of the case. Where the professional has taken steps to address their behaviour, it's important that they engage with the regulatory process so that the Fitness to Practise Committee is aware of these steps. Further guidance for professionals on how to do this is available under guidance on

engaging with your case

Whether it's highly unlikely that the conduct will be repeated

It might be easier for the Committee to be satisfied that conduct will be highly unlikely to be repeated if it is an isolated incident and no other factors described exist. If this is the case, then this would suggest that the professional can practise kindly, safely and professionally, resulting in a finding of no impairment.

2. The public interest

Consideration of the public interest will require the Fitness to Practise Committee to decide whether a finding of impairment is needed to:

- uphold proper professional standards and conduct
- maintain public confidence in the profession⁶

FtP Committee decision making

In upholding proper professional standards and conduct and maintaining public confidence in the profession, the Fitness to Practise Committee will need to consider whether the concern is easy to put right. For example, it might be possible to address clinical errors with suitable education and training.

However, there are types of concerns that are so serious that, even if the professional addresses the behaviour, a finding of impairment is required either to uphold proper professional standards and conduct or to maintain public confidence in the profession.

Examples of this are:

- A professional involved in a sexual relationship with someone in their care in breach of the PSA's guidance on clear sexual boundaries
- Conduct which has led to a conviction for a specified offence or sentence of imprisonment or conduct which otherwise raises fundamental questions about the person's ability to uphold the values and standards set out in the Code. This could include sexual misconduct, or abuse or neglect of children or vulnerable adults.

- Deliberately causing harm to people receiving care
- Discriminatory behaviours such as racism, sexism, homophobia or any other types of discrimination

These examples are not listed in order of importance. They are all examples of serious conduct where the panel would need to consider whether a finding of impairment is required because of the public interest. More examples can be found in our guidance on misconduct

Even where there might not be a risk of future harm to people receiving care, a finding of impairment may still be required in the public interest to mark the profound seriousness of the conduct which has taken place. For example, where people receiving care are aware that the professional caring for them has a recent criminal conviction involving violence, deception or hate crime, this could instil a lack of confidence in the professional's care and the profession more generally.

Are these factors the only factors which will be considered?

No. The above list is not a list of every single factor that the Fitness to Practise Committee will consider when deciding whether a professional's fitness to practise is impaired. A Fitness to Practise Committee may consider other factors that are relevant to the case that they are deciding. Each case has its own individual facts and circumstances, which is why the above factors are a guide.

Are the consequences of the professional's conduct a relevant factor?

No. Sometimes a professional's conduct might have serious consequences, such as death or serious injury. In these circumstances, a finding of impairment will only be appropriate if the professional's conduct alone requires a finding of impairment. For example, a finding of impairment will not be appropriate in the public interest where the consequences of the professional's conduct are serious but the professional's conduct itself would not require a finding of impairment. Fitness to practise proceedings are not a means of punishing professionals but are a way to ensure that the professionals on our register can practise kindly, safely and professionally.

Providing reasons for a decision on impairment

Where the Fitness to Practise Committee reaches a decision on impairment, they should clearly articulate their reasons for coming to their decision. The reasons should include a comprehensive explanation of the factors they have considered and their conclusions in relation to those factors.

It is essential that the Fitness to Practise Committee demonstrates that they have considered the future risk that the professional poses to people receiving care and the public interest. Where there is a finding of impairment, the reasons for that finding should be clear. Likewise, where the Committee finds the allegations proven, but reaches a decision of no impairment, they will clearly need to explain why a finding of no impairment is in the public

Consensual panel determination

Reference: DMA-2 Last Updated: 23/06/2021

A consensual panel determination takes place when we agree with the nurse, midwife, or nursing associate that their fitness to practise is impaired and what the appropriate sanction is for their case. The nurse, midwife or nursing associate must admit the factual allegations against them. We'll also agree on any interim order that might be required.

This agreement is put in writing, and we then ask a panel to approve the provisional agreement we've reached.

The provisional agreement will usually be considered by a panel at a meeting but could be considered at a hearing if the nurse, midwife or nursing associate asks for one.¹ (See dealing with cases at meetings or hearings.)

We use consensual panel determinations to help to resolve cases more quickly and easily.

The panel will make its own decision about whether the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise is impaired, what sanction, if any, to impose, and whether an interim order² is required.

¹ The provisional agreement may also be considered at a hearing if one is considered 'desirable'. This is unlikely to be the case given the nurse, midwife or nursing associate will have accepted the factual allegations against them, that their fitness to practise is impaired and agreed with us the appropriate sanction to be imposed and any interim order.

² See our guidance on 'Interim orders after a sanction is imposed'

Essential criteria

Reference: DMA-2a Last Updated: 27/02/2024

In this guide

- Overview
- Admission of the facts
- Admission of impairment

Overview

We'll only consider a consensual panel determination agreement where:

1. we are satisfied that there is enough evidence to enable the Fitness to Practise Committee to make a finding of impairment;
2. the nurse, midwife or nursing associate accepts the facts of the allegation and that their fitness to practise is impaired.

Usually it will be appropriate to wait until we have completed our investigation before considering whether a consensual panel determination will be appropriate. If the professional agrees with the outcome of our investigation and our proposed sanction it will often be appropriate to refer the matter directly to a panel for a consensual panel determination, rather than referring the matter to the case examiners for a case to answer decision.

Admission of the facts

A nurse, midwife or nursing associate must accept the facts of the allegation in full. We won't drop serious parts of the factual allegation in exchange for admissions to other parts.

If parts of the factual allegation don't increase the overall seriousness of the case, or it's highly unlikely parts of the factual allegation can be proved, we'll consider no longer proceeding with that part of the allegation.

Admission of impairment

As well as admitting the factual allegations, the nurse, midwife or nursing associate must also accept that their fitness to practise is impaired. This includes accepting the grounds on which their fitness to practise is impaired, for example, in a misconduct case accepting that the factual allegations amount to misconduct.

This shows a level of insight that's essential for a sanction to be agreed and for the case to be resolved by a consensual panel determination agreement.

The process

In this guide

- Agreeing a consensual panel determination
- Comments from the referrer
- What happens at the meeting or hearing?

Agreeing a consensual panel determination

We first consider if the nurse, midwife or nursing associate has met the essential criteria. If they meet the criteria, we consider if the nurse, midwife or nursing associate has legal advice or representation.

If there are concerns about the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's ability to understand the effects of seeking a consensual panel determination, we'll try to resolve them, and may recommend that they seek legal advice. If it's not possible to resolve those concerns, it might not be possible to pursue a consensual panel determination.

If the case is suitable to be resolved by a consensual panel determination agreement, we'll reach a provisional view on the appropriate sanction level.

We do this by assessing all the circumstances of the case with reference to our sanctions guidance. We'll share our view on the sanction with the nurse, midwife or nursing associate, including if we think an interim order is necessary.

If, after discussing the sanction with the nurse, midwife or nursing associate we can't agree on the appropriate level of sanction, the case will proceed to a meeting or hearing without any consensual panel determination agreement.

If we're able to agree on the appropriate level of sanction, we'll then prepare a provisional agreement. This will include a statement of the facts, why we consider that their fitness to practise is impaired, the proposed sanction and any interim order that may be required. The nurse, midwife or nursing associate must confirm that they agree the contents of the provisional agreement.

Either party can decide they no longer want to resolve the case with a consensual panel determination agreement at any time before it's taken to a meeting or hearing.

If this happens, the case will proceed to a meeting or hearing, which will take place without any consensual panel determination agreement in place. The panel won't have sight of the draft agreement.

Comments from the referrer

We'll always let the person who referred the case and any interested parties (such as family members) know what we've provisionally agreed with the nurse, midwife or nursing associate. We'll usually share the entire agreement unless there's any private or confidential information that would be considered by the panel in private, in which case, we'd redact that information in line with our Information Handling guidance.

We'll ask the person who referred the case to send us any comments they might have about the proposed agreement so that we can consider their views. We might also ask the person who's been affected by the case to send any comments they have about the proposed agreement so that we can consider their views too.

We don't ask for comments where the referrer is the police force referring a conviction or caution unless the force or its personnel have had significant and ongoing involvement in the case.

FtP Committee decision making

We will always carefully consider any comments provided by a referrer. This can sometimes lead us to reconsider our view of the case. If that happens, we'll try to reach a new agreement with the nurse, midwife or nursing associate. If we can't reach a new agreement, the case will go to a meeting or hearing without any consensual panel determination agreement.

If we can reach an agreement, then the case, including the revised proposed agreement, will be considered by the panel. This will usually be at a meeting but can be at a hearing if the nurse, midwife or nursing associate asks for a hearing.

At the meeting or hearing, we'll usually provide the panel with any comments from the referrer so the panel can take those comments into account in reaching its decision.

If there are comments from the referrer we don't think are fair or relevant for the panel to see, we may not provide them to the panel. For example, if the referrer makes new allegations that weren't part of the allegations which form the basis of the proposed agreement, we wouldn't share that information with the panel. Instead, we'd consider treating the new allegations as a new referral.

We'll let the referrer know if we don't think we can share some or all of their comments with the panel, and we'll explain why.

If we're sharing the referrer's comments with the panel, we'll always share them with the nurse, midwife, or nursing associate first so they can raise any concerns or objections.

If a referrer insists that their comments aren't shared with the nurse, midwife or nursing associate, we won't be able to share those comments with the panel or the nurse, midwife or nursing associate.

What happens at the meeting or hearing?

The provisional agreement will usually be considered by a panel at a meeting, but can be considered at a hearing if the nurse, midwife or nursing associate asks for one.

At a meeting, the nurse, midwife or nursing associate won't be in attendance, and there won't be a case presenter.

Where a panel considers the agreement at a hearing, the nurse, midwife or nursing associate will be able to attend, and our case presenter will be in attendance.

At the meeting (or hearing), the panel will be provided with the consensual panel determination agreement and should consider all aspects of it.

When the panel considers the agreed statement of facts, it will need to be satisfied that it has a clear picture of the factual background. The panel might request more information if it thinks our agreed statement of facts hasn't made clear, or covered sufficiently, the substance and details of what went wrong.¹

The panel should exercise its own independent judgement to decide whether the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise is impaired (including the reason for impairment, for example, whether their behaviour amounted to misconduct), what sanction, if any, to impose using our sanctions guidance, and whether it's necessary to impose an interim order. The panel isn't bound by the agreement, but it must consider the agreement carefully when reaching its decision.

We'll only put forward a provisional agreement for consideration where we consider that it sets out a reasonable, proportionate and fair outcome.

The panel can decide to:

- accept the provisional agreement, or
- reject the provisional agreement.

Accepting the provisional agreement

FtP Committee decision making

Before the panel accepts the provisional agreement it should be satisfied that:

- the facts are found proved by admission, (or at a hearing, announce that the allegation is proved by admission) and,
- the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise is impaired by reason of the relevant ground of impairment.

The panel should also impose the sanction and any interim order as set out in the provisional agreement

Rejecting the provisional agreement

The panel may make a different decision about whether the nurse, midwife or nursing associate is impaired, what sanction to impose, and what interim order to impose. However, the provisional agreement should always form the starting point for the panel's decision-making. Where the panel reaches a different conclusion, it must provide clear reasons for doing so.

Where the panel disagrees with the conclusions set out in the provisional agreement, the outcome will depend on the nature of the disagreement and if the matter is being considered at a meeting or a hearing.

Based on the admitted facts, if the panel decides that the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise isn't impaired, it should make that finding and close the case. The panel is free to decide to impose a less restrictive sanction than proposed in the provisional agreement. They can do this without any adjournment being necessary (this applies to both meetings and hearings).

If the panel is considering the matter at a meeting and wishes to impose a more restrictive sanction than the one proposed, it should adjourn the matter. The case will then be considered by another panel at a hearing. The nurse, midwife or nursing associate should then be advised of the reasons given by the first panel about why they consider a more restrictive sanction might be required.

When the second panel considers the matter following an adjournment at a meeting, the nurse, midwife or nursing associate will have the opportunity to make any further submissions in writing or in person. The second panel must consider the terms of the provisional agreement afresh and shouldn't be influenced by any views expressed by the first panel. The panel should consider any further views expressed by us, the nurse, midwife or nursing associate and/or their representative.

If the panel is considering the matter at a hearing and wants to impose a sanction that is more restrictive than the one proposed in the provisional agreement, it must:

- first indicate that it is considering a more restrictive sanction, and
- give both our case presenter and the nurse, midwife, nursing associate and/or their representative the opportunity to comment.

If the nurse, midwife, nursing associate or their representative agrees to the more restrictive sanction, the panel can continue to impose the sanction. The CPD will count as being rejected, and the matter adjourned to a full hearing if the nurse, midwife, nursing associate, or representative don't agree to a more restrictive sanction. This includes if they aren't in attendance and can't be contacted to ask for their consent.

We would encourage the nurse, midwife or nursing associate or their representative to attend any CPD hearing. If they don't attend the hearing, they should be contactable by phone or video link to address anything that may arise on the day of the hearing. These arrangements should be made ahead of the hearing.

The panel's reasoning

The panel should provide clear reasoning for its decisions on why the nurse, midwife or nursing associate is impaired (including the reason for impairment, for example, why their behaviour amounted to misconduct), the appropriate sanction, and whether an interim order is necessary. This should include how the outcome protects the public and satisfies any public interest.

The panel may adopt the agreement's reasoning, and should explain which parts of the agreement it accepts and why. If it disagrees with any part of the agreement, the panel should explain which parts it disagrees with and identify clear reasoning and justification for doing so.

FtP Committee decision making

If the panel has had sight of comments from the referrer, then it should explain in its reasoning how the panel has considered these comments as part of its decision making process.

The panel should include the full consensual panel determination agreement in its decision document, even in cases where it disagrees with the conclusions reached. As that agreement reflects what's been agreed between the parties, it's better practice for the panel to express its decision and views separately after the text of the agreement, rather than altering the original agreement. The panel may correct typographical or spelling errors within the agreement.

Where the panel decides that the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise is impaired and imposes a sanction, we'll publish the panel's reasons, including the consensual panel determination agreement, in line with our Fitness to Practise Publication Guidance.

Requests for further information

Consensual panel determinations will usually be considered at meetings unless the registrant has specifically requested a hearing. If the panel decides it needs clarification or further information on an issue, it should consider postponing or adjourning the meeting with directions. This is so that the matter can be looked into, and if necessary further submissions, documents or evidence can be sent to the panel.

Taking such a step is more proportionate than referring the case to a hearing when it might not be needed to resolve the issue.²

At a hearing, if the panel decides that it needs clarification or further information on an issue, it should raise this with the parties before deciding to accept or reject the provisional agreement. Our case presenter and the nurse, midwife or nursing associate can then address the panel on the points raised.

What is offering no evidence?

We keep all cases under review while we prepare them for the Fitness to Practise Committee. Sometimes, as part of that review, it becomes clear to us that it wouldn't be in the public interest to carry on with all or part of the case. In limited circumstances it may be appropriate for us to use our power to 'offer no evidence'.¹ This means that we'll ask a full panel of the Fitness to Practise Committee to approve our decision not to continue with all or part of the case against a nurse, midwife or nursing associate. We will only offer no evidence in a particular case if it fits with our overarching objective.

We'll only apply to offer no evidence against a nurse, midwife or nursing associate in the following circumstances:

- When a particular part of the charge adds nothing to the overall seriousness of the case.
- When there is no longer a realistic prospect of some or all of the factual allegation being proved.
- When there is no longer a realistic prospect of a panel finding that the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise is currently impaired.

It will be up to the panel to decide whether it agrees that it's appropriate for us to offer no evidence, and not continue with all or part of the case against the nurse, midwife or nursing associate. When we ask a panel to do this and the case is at a hearing, we will open our case and fully explain the background, and our reasons for offering no evidence. If the case is being considered at a meeting we will set this out clearly in our statement of case.

In some circumstances we may apply to offer no evidence on part of the charge in a case where we've agreed a consensual panel determination with the nurse or midwife. If we are doing this we'll make it clear that we want to offer no evidence, and fully explain our reasons, in the text of the draft agreement between us and the nurse, midwife or nursing associate.

Where part of the charge doesn't make the case more serious

If we're satisfied that one or more of the alleged facts against the nurse, midwife or nursing associate doesn't add anything to how serious the case against them is, we may decide to offer no evidence on those parts of the charge. We won't do this unless we're satisfied that the remaining parts of the charge properly reflect the extent of our concerns about the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise, and the evidence about them. We'll need to consider the risk of harm to patients, or the public's trust in nurses, midwives and nursing associates that could arise from what the nurse, midwife or nursing associate is alleged to have done.

No realistic prospect of proving the facts of the case

FtP Committee decision making

It's not in the public interest for us to pursue factual charges against a nurse, midwife or nursing associate if there isn't enough evidence to prove them. Offering no evidence because there isn't enough evidence to prove the facts, so that there's no longer a realistic prospect, will only be appropriate if:

- the state of the evidence has changed since case examiners made a finding of case to answer²
- it has become apparent that the case examiners' decision was made on an incorrect basis
- the charge relies on the evidence of a witness who cannot attend a hearing, and an application to rely on their statement as hearsay evidence has been rejected
- the case was referred directly to the Fitness to Practise Committee, and since then, our investigation has shown that it is no longer in the public interest to continue with the allegation or part of the allegation.

No realistic prospect of fitness to practise being impaired

We'll only consider offering no evidence because there's no realistic prospect of the panel deciding that the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise is currently impaired if:

- it's become clear that the case examiners' decision was made on an incorrect basis, or
- new evidence about the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's current fitness to practise has emerged, for example evidence about the context in which the incident occurred or evidence of their insight and any steps they've taken to strengthen their practice.

The passage of time may be a relevant change in circumstances. However, the nurse, midwife or nursing associate would need to show that they have worked in a professional capacity, using their registration. They would need to produce evidence showing that they've addressed the issue with their practice, from which it's clear that offering no evidence would meet the aims of our overarching objective.

Informing the referrer about a decision to offer no evidence

If we've decided to offer no evidence, we'll tell the person who first referred the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to us about this, if we can do so without risking any unfairness or prejudice at a future hearing (which could happen, for example, if that person was a witness in the case).

If that person is a witness in the case, we will decide what information we can give them. Our general approach is that we should give them as much information as we possibly can, while making sure the future hearing is fair. Ideally, we'll be able to explain our reasons for offering no evidence fully. We'll always tell them that the panel might decide to reject our application, and proceed with the charge of its own accord.

If the person who first referred the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to us provides us with any comments about our decision we will place these before the panel if they are relevant, and if it would be fair to do so.

There will be cases where it won't be possible for us to fully explain our decision to offer no evidence before the meeting or hearing. If this happens, we will let the person who referred the concerns to us know, before the meeting or hearing, that we have decided to offer no evidence. We will then give them a full explanation for our decision after the meeting or hearing.

Offering no evidence: the panel's decision making process

If we're offering no evidence at a hearing, before the charges are read out, we will tell the panel that we intend to offer no evidence to all or part of the charges. This means that when the charges are read out, the panel won't ask the nurse, midwife or nursing associate for a response to the charge(s) we're offering no evidence on, until it has heard and decided our application.

When we offer no evidence, we'll invite the panel to consider the steps we've taken to obtain the evidence relevant to the facts, the nature of the evidence, and what evidence was considered by the case examiners. If the case is being considered at a hearing our case presenter will give the panel a full opening statement so the panel clearly understands the case, and why we are offering no evidence on all or part of the charges. Often, the case presenter will provide a written opening of the case which fully and fairly summarises the evidence to the panel. In some situations the case presenter may decide it is more helpful for the panel to be provided with copies of some or all of the evidence to help it reach its decision. If the case is being considered at a meeting, we'll set out our reasoning in our statement of case.

FtP Committee decision making

We will always make the panel fully aware of the steps we took during the investigation, including any problems we encountered, and what we did about them. When we do this, we consider that we have a duty of good faith to fairly explain how serious the allegations were, and why we no longer intend to pursue them.

In very rare cases, the charges we want to offer no evidence on might be so serious that they would make it unfair for the same panel to go on and hear the rest of the case. If that happens, we will arrange for a separate panel to deal with the full hearing or meeting.

Where the case is being dealt with at a hearing, the panel will ask the nurse, midwife or nursing associate if they have anything they wish to say to the panel about our application. The panel will be given legal advice before they make a decision on our application.³

If the panel is not satisfied with the application to offer no evidence, it can still call evidence of its own motion.⁴

When it is considering whether to call evidence on its own, the panel may find that our guidance on directing further investigation during a hearing is helpful. If necessary, the panel would have to adjourn the hearing (or refer the case to hearing if it is at a meeting) to make sure witnesses can attend and give evidence. In some cases it may be appropriate for the panel to decide that this evidence will be heard by a different panel if this would be fairer to all parties.

What happens after the panel's decision?

If the panel does not approve of us offering no evidence, and either calls evidence on its own or directs us to carry out further investigation, the hearing will proceed (possibly after an adjournment to allow us time to investigate or arrange for witnesses to attend).

If we have offered no evidence on the whole of the charge against the nurse, midwife or nursing associate, and the panel agrees with our application, the panel will decide that the allegation is not well founded, and give its reasons. That will bring the case against the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to an end, and no findings will be made against them. The charge can only then be re-opened if there is a successful appeal to the courts against the panel's decision.

If we have offered no evidence only on parts of the overall charge against the nurse, midwife or nursing associate, and the panel agrees with us, the panel will provide reasons for its decision. It can then amend the charge⁵ to remove those parts of the charge on which it has approved our application to offer no evidence. The nurse, midwife or nursing associate will not then have to answer those parts of the charge, and they will no longer form part of the allegation against them.

1 PSA v NMC & X [2018] EWHC 20 (Admin) para 55-57

2 For example, a witness may refuse to attend a hearing. We may have been aware that the witness was reluctant to engage at the case examiner stage and the case examiners may still have found a case to answer. Where this happens, it is still likely to amount to a change in the state of the evidence because we will have had the opportunity to consider any reasonable adjustments or measures to address the witness' concerns and to encourage them to attend.

3 Legal advice is likely to refer to the case of PSA v NMC & X [2018] EWHC 70 (Admin). This case also makes clear at paragraph 56 that R v Galbraith [1981] 1 WLR 1039 is not relevant to this type of application.

Abuse of process

What is an abuse of process?

It's a claim that the case has been unfairly progressed and should be stopped. This can be made by a registrant or raised by a panel.

This guidance explains the circumstances in which it may be appropriate for a panel to use its power to stop a case as an abuse of process.

A nurse, midwife or nursing associate can make an abuse of process application at any stage of the panel's decision-making process. They can make the argument about the whole case against them, or about part of the case. Equally, a panel may decide on its own that there has been an abuse of process.

If the nurse, midwife or nursing associate makes the application, they will only succeed if they can show that it's more likely than not that the alleged abuse of process can't be properly rectified in any other way than to stop the case.

How does the panel decide if there is an abuse of process?

The panel can decide there is an abuse of process if:

- it will be impossible for the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to have a fair hearing, or
- continuing with the case would, in all the circumstances, offend the panel's sense of 'justice and propriety'.¹

In deciding whether there has been an abuse of process which means the case should be stopped, the panel will consider whether the alleged abuse of process (such as delay, or a failure to disclose evidence) has caused serious prejudice or unfairness to the nurse, midwife or nursing associate.

In accordance with its overarching public protection objective, the panel will also consider whether there are ways of putting right the serious prejudice or unfairness, so that the nurse, midwife or nursing associate can have a fair hearing without stopping the case.

See some examples of the various types of abuse of process arguments that have been considered by the courts, below.

Abuse of process arguments

Unreasonable delay

The nurse, midwife or nursing associate's right to a fair hearing under human rights legislation includes a right to having their case heard within a reasonable time,² so the length of any delay is a relevant consideration for the panel.

FtP Committee decision making

For our purposes, the relevant time runs from when we first notified the nurse, midwife or nursing associate that we were sending their case for an investigation.³

The panel will only use its power to stop all or part of a case due to delay, in exceptional circumstances. This could be where there is real prejudice to the nurse, midwife or nursing associate which means that a fair hearing would be impossible because of the delays.

In an argument about delay, the panel will hear submissions from the nurse, midwife or nursing associate, and from us, on the circumstances leading up to the application.

These will include the chronology of events, any possible reasons for delays, the way the nurse or midwife engaged with our process, and what any external third parties did or failed to do.

Unreasonable delay will be a possible abuse, if the period of the delay gives grounds for 'real concern'.⁴

In considering this, it will be relevant to consider the effect of the delay on the proceedings and any unfairness it could cause to the nurse, midwife or nursing associate.⁵

If the delay affected the memory or availability of witnesses or documentary evidence, these may be factors the panel takes into account in deciding whether the delay means it's no longer possible for the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to have a fair hearing.

It will also be relevant to consider the stage the hearing has reached, and what steps we could take to lessen the effect of the delay and make sure a fair hearing is still possible.⁶

If the panel could make a direction, or the parties could take a particular course of action to put the unfairness right, it will be important to explore those options before the panel decides that the hearing should be stopped as an abuse of process.

The complexity of the case or delay caused by a nurse, midwife or nursing associate will not be a reason to stop all or part of the proceedings.⁷

Incomplete or non-disclosure of information

When we are investigating a nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise, we need to provide them with enough information to understand the case against them, and to allow them to respond to our concerns.

One relevant factor to consider may be what level of disclosure is 'reasonable' in the circumstances.

Sometimes, where the nurse, midwife or nursing associate cannot reasonably be expected to gather relevant material themselves, we may need to help with this.

However there's no general duty on us, the regulator, to gather evidence on behalf of the nurse, midwife or nursing associate,⁸ which would of course determine what evidence we'd have in our possession and what we'd therefore be able to disclose.

For more information about this, see our guidance on disclosure.

Increasingly, we ask the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to tell us about the context around what happened, and we do this early on in our investigation.

In deciding what disclosure is reasonable, it will be relevant to consider how the nurse, midwife or nursing associate initially responded when we asked them to tell us about relevant issues back when we started investigating.

If they refused to engage with our investigation at that stage, it is less likely to be reasonable to expect us to gather information on their behalf, about the same issues, if the case gets as far as a Fitness to Practise Committee panel.

This question will be relevant to whether the nurse, midwife or nursing associate has suffered prejudice or unfairness.

FtP Committee decision making

The panel is responsible for regulating its own proceedings, and has various powers to require us and the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to exchange relevant information. The panel can consider whether to order adjournments, or give directions to obtain evidence, to see whether the issue that is alleged to cause an abuse of process, can be resolved without stopping the case altogether.

The panel can also ask for further information as to why the evidence is incomplete, to satisfy itself as to whether we have acted improperly, or whether the information has simply been lost.

In circumstances where there is evidence of impropriety in us not disclosing information to the nurse, midwife or nursing associate, potentially this could mean there is an abuse of process.

If the evidence before the panel remains incomplete, the panel can also consider its powers to decide what evidence is admissible, as a way of avoiding possible injustice.

It's possible that refusing to admit some of our evidence, because it would be unfair without also seeing or hearing the missing evidence, (which could provide important context), could avoid any injustice or unfairness.

Retracting a promise

Another possible ground for an abuse of process application is that we made a promise or gave the nurse, midwife or nursing associate an assurance, and later retracted it.

Some examples of this might be promising not to proceed with investigations about a particular concern, or promising that we would keep particular information private. There may be other kinds of promise or assurance that it would be an abuse of process to retract.

In some circumstances it wouldn't be an abuse of process for us to investigate and take action about a fitness to practise concern that we've previously told a nurse, midwife or nursing associate that we won't be proceeding with.

For example, there could be new information or evidence that we weren't aware of when we made the first decision that shows we need to take action to prevent the nurse, midwife or nursing associate putting patients or members of the public at risk of harm.

The panel should consider this when trying to assess whether there is unfairness or injustice to the nurse, midwife or nursing associate.

It is relevant that we have specific powers to revisit decisions under our rules⁹ and in case law¹⁰ which include decisions made at any stage of our fitness to practise.

When considering promises or assurances we gave to the nurse, midwife or nursing associate, the panel can, if it needs to, ask for information about:

- what assurances we gave
- the level of officer or decision maker
- when in our process we gave the assurance.

Equally, it may also be relevant to consider whether the nurse, midwife or nursing associate could reasonably have relied on the assurance.

For example, if we stated we would not take action about a particular incident we were investigating, but the nurse, midwife or nursing associate then disclosed another more serious concern, would it be reasonable for the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to assume that we would not investigate the new concern?

Possible unfairness or injustice after promises made to nurses, midwives or nursing associates might be able to be resolved by amending charges or some other action to cure the possible unfairness.

As always, the panel is able to consider any reasonable options to address any possible unfairness, before deciding that abuse of process is made out and that the case should be stopped.

Bad faith or serious breach of professional duty

FtP Committee decision making

Sometimes, if one of our officers or decision makers acts in bad faith, this could cause an abuse of process, if that bad faith causes prejudice or unfairness to the nurse, midwife or nursing associate meaning they can't have a fair hearing, or that to proceed would be an injustice.

An application based on bad faith will need to include specific examples and evidence of how the nurse, midwife or nursing associate says we've acted in bad faith, or one of our officers breached their professional duty. It will also need to explain how the nurse, midwife or nursing associate says the fairness of our process has been affected.

Directing further investigation during a hearing

- Why should a panel order us to investigate further?
- When should a panel direct further investigation?

Why should a panel order us to investigate further?

In every case that goes to the Fitness to Practise Committee we need to make sure that we have given the panel all the relevant evidence. The panel needs to understand the background including the context in which the incident occurred, consider all the relevant facts and make a fair and fully informed decision that best protects the public.

If this hasn't happened, and there is important evidence available, that is missing, or that we haven't put before the panel, the panel can direct us to get that further evidence. The panel should not consider itself to be 'bound' by that lack of the evidence to find a charge not proved, it should take a more proactive role than a judge in a criminal trial, and where necessary intervene to make sure that cases are properly presented, and request the further evidence.

The panel can use its powers to require people to attend hearings or produce relevant documents¹, or its powers to adjourn the case, as it needs to.

When should a panel direct further investigation?

There are a number of reasons why a panel may direct us to carry out further investigations. These include:

- New information has come to light that neither we nor the nurse, midwife or nursing associate have seen, which could undermine our case, support our case, or support the case of the nurse, midwife or nursing associate.
- The information currently before a panel is obviously incomplete or does not cover all the areas of concern. One example of this could be missing pages from patient notes, or from some other important document.
- Further information is essential to clarify or expand on evidence already obtained
- The nurse, midwife or nursing associate has provided new information about the context in which the incident occurred which would have a material impact on the outcome of the case

If it's clear to the panel that evidence exists that it requires in order to make its decision, but we have not provided it with that evidence, it should consider whether to adjourn the hearing to allow us to gather that evidence. In making this decision the panel should consider the following:

- Whether the evidence is important to an issue it has to decide.
- Whether the evidence needs to be tested, perhaps through asking questions of witnesses.
- Whether the panel can consider its decisions and reach a satisfactory conclusion without this evidence.
- Our overarching duty to protect the public, and the panel's duty to make a decision that satisfies the overarching objective in a fair and proportionate way.
- The overall fairness of the proceedings. As well as the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's right to a fair hearing, this also includes fairness to the people involved in the events the case is about, and fairness to us in exercising our statutory function of protecting the public.
- The public interest in the expeditious disposal of the case and the potential inconvenience caused by any delay to the registrant and any witnesses.²

FtP Committee decision making

If after considering all of the above the panel considers that the further evidence is needed to help it decide an important issue in the case and will help it make a decision that best protects the public, it should order us to carry out the further investigation.

When further evidence is received during a hearing, panels may need to consider whether to amend the charge.³ When considering whether to amend a charge, the panel will consider the fairness in doing so and the overarching objective to protect the public.

Overview

One of the Fitness to Practise Committee's (FtPC) most important functions is to resolve disputes between the NMC and the nurse, midwife or nursing associate. Unless the nurse, midwife or nursing associate admits the charges against them, or agrees with our evidence, the panel will need to decide what happened.

This will include resolving whether a contextual factor was present as a matter of fact if it is disputed, and if the contextual factor would have a material impact on the outcome of the case. Panels resolve disputes using the evidence that is put before them.

If we can't agree any part of our case, we will attempt to prove it by putting evidence before the panel. The nurse, midwife or nursing associate is also able to put evidence before the panel in support of their position.

Admissibility of evidence

The only evidence that may be provided to the panel is evidence which is relevant to one of the issues the panel needs to decide. It also needs to be fair to the people involved in the case, including patients, family members and loved ones, the nurse, midwife or nursing associate and us as a regulator, that the panel considers that evidence.

Evidence may be unfair where it cannot be challenged.

For example, this could be where the person who gives the evidence cannot be questioned, where it relates to a subjective opinion as opposed to an objective (although possibly disputed) fact.

Findings of other organisations or bodies

Often, another organisation or body¹ will have carried out some form of investigation into the matters being considered by the panel. The underlying evidence relied on by another organisation or body is admissible and can be presented to a panel (and form part of the bundle) if relevant to the allegations or the wider background.²

The weight that a panel will give to this evidence, which can include statements of fact and expressions of expert opinion, will be up to the FtP committee to decide using its expertise and experience as an independent panel.

The findings of other bodies may be admissible as evidence before a panel.³ When considering whether to admit

FtP Committee decision making

evidence of findings made by another body, the panel will need to address the following:

1. What is the relevance of those findings to the issues it is considering?
2. Do the findings need to be admitted, given the underlying evidence itself is likely to be relevant and admissible?

The fact that another body has found certain matters proved does not mean that the panel can adopt those findings. The panel must allow the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to argue their case and rely on their own evidence. The panel must reach its own view and own conclusions having regarded all the relevant evidence.

The panel must not use the findings of another body as a substitute for reaching its own decision on the issues before it. The judgment or findings of another decision-maker on the issues before the panel are not relevant to the panel's decision-making. It may also be unfair for the judgments to significantly influence the tribunal's mind on the crucial issues before it for the same reasons.⁴

How evidence is given to a panel

Evidence can be given to a panel in several different ways. What is important is that the panel can fairly consider the case before them.

At a meeting, evidence is in the form of written statements and documents. At a hearing, people might speak to the panel to give evidence and to answer any questions that we, the nurse, midwife, nursing associate or the panel may have. This will usually happen if there is a dispute over the facts in the case.

Our rules don't dictate how evidence should be given and people can give evidence to a panel in a number of ways. This includes attending a hearing centre, over video-link or by telephone.

A decision to hold a hearing at a hearings centre does not mean that a person needs to attend to give evidence 'in-person'. How a person gives evidence will be a separate decision.

In most circumstances, there is no disadvantage in someone giving evidence by video-link compared to appearing in the same room as the panel⁵. In some cases it may be better to give evidence by video-link rather than over the telephone, although telephone evidence may still be considered a fair way for the witness to give their evidence.

we'll consider what's fair and practical for the hearing in deciding how they will give their evidence. This includes if they have the right technology and any personal circumstances that might prevent their participation at the hearing centre or remotely.

We'll inform the nurse, midwife or nursing associate who is subject to the proceedings (and their representative) in advance of the hearing how it is intended our witnesses will give evidence.

If the nurse, midwife, nursing associate or their representative object to how it is intended a witness will give evidence, we'll try to resolve any disagreements in advance of the hearing. We'll do this by arranging a preliminary meeting as soon as possible so a chair of the FtPC can decide how that witness should attend.⁶

The chair will hear from both sides, and it may be relevant for them to consider our guidance on the demeanour of witnesses. They'll also consider what benefit there might be in requiring a witness to attend our hearings centre, bearing in mind any concerns the witness may have about this.

we'll ask them to give us some information about those witnesses which will include how they'd like to give their evidence.

If we object to the way it's proposed that someone will give evidence, we'll arrange a preliminary meeting so that a Chair of the FtPC can give directions about how they should participate.

When the substantive hearing starts, we'll let the panel know how each witness will give their evidence. We won't make a formal application, so the panel won't need to make a decision about how people will give evidence at the hearing.

If, however, there is an objection about how someone gives evidence and we haven't been able to hold a preliminary meeting before the hearing, the panel may need to decide how that particular individual will give their evidence.

FtP Committee decision making

If during the hearing, the panel or either side think that the way someone is giving evidence is causing a risk of unfairness, the panel can ask the individual to give evidence in a different way.

Who decides what evidence is admissible

The panel making decisions about the issues in the case will also decide what evidence is admissible.

This will usually mean that we provide that evidence to the panel. As professional adjudicators, we consider that if the panel members decide the evidence is actually inadmissible, they can put the information out of their minds when making a decision about what happened.⁷

Weight

When considering how disputes of fact are decided by the panel, a useful analogy is a set of weighing scales. Into one pan of the scales goes all the evidence that's supportive of a fact, and into the other goes all the evidence that's unsupportive. When we talk about the 'weight' of evidence, we mean how far a piece of evidence moves the scales.

Some evidence may be obviously reliable and is therefore likely to carry substantial weight, for example documents created in the course of business, official records, audio/visual recordings.

The weight of other evidence may depend on what the panel decides about whether a witness or piece of evidence is credible. In those circumstances the panel will need to carefully consider issues like:

- whether the evidence is 'inherently plausible'
- whether it's supported by other evidence
- consistency with previous accounts
- how likely the person giving the evidence is to be mistaken

Burden of Proof

Where facts relating to an allegation are in dispute (including those relating to context), the burden of proving such facts rests on the NMC.⁸ The Tribunal's task is to assess the evidence in the round and decide whether the NMC has shown the fact was more likely to have happened than not.

What does the panel do if the evidence on the weighing scales in relation to an important disputed fact is evenly balanced?

In these circumstances the panel can find in favour of the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's position on the disputed fact without calling into question the evidence or credibility of the person giving evidence on behalf of the NMC. This is because in situations where material facts are in dispute, the NMC bears the burden of proving that their position is the correct one – this can be referred to as the "burden of proof".

Credibility

There is a considerable body of authority setting out the lessons of experience and of science in relation to decisions on facts.⁹

When assessing credibility panels should not rely on the appearance or behaviour of a person giving oral evidence ('demeanour'). One of the most important qualities expected of a decision-maker is that they will try to avoid being influenced by personal biases and prejudices in their decision-making.

Panels should not attempt to assess whether someone's evidence is truthful from the manner in which it is given, such as from their appearance, tone or other aspects of their behaviour in answering questions.

A person may have confidence in his or her recollection and be honest. However, that does not mean that their recollection provides any reliable guide to the truth on this basis alone.

We believe memories to be more reliable than they are. Two common errors are to suppose (1) that the stronger and more vivid the recollection, the more likely it is to be accurate; (2) the more confident another person is in their recollection, the more likely it is to be accurate.

FtP Committee decision making

Memories are fluid and malleable and can be subject to powerful biases. Events can come to be recalled as memories which did not happen at all or which happened to somebody else. The older the events, the more important it is to hold fast to these principles of reasoning.

The only objective and reliable approach is to focus on the content of a person's evidence. Panels should consider whether evidence is plausible and consistent with objectively verifiable evidence (including evidence of what the witness has said on other occasions) and with known or probable facts. Panels should start with the objective facts as shown by authentic, contemporaneous documents, independent of the person giving evidence, and use oral evidence to test it.¹⁰

Hearsay

In general terms, hearsay is any evidence which is not given orally by a witness with direct experience of the matter they are giving evidence about, and which is being given to prove an issue in dispute.

Evidence given by telephone and video link is not hearsay evidence. To the extent that there are limitations on evidence given by remote means that is a matter of weight (see above).

Most commonly, hearsay evidence will involve a witness reporting what they were told about something in issue by another individual who is not themselves a witness, or a statement being placed before a panel without the maker of the statement giving oral evidence.

Hearsay evidence is not inadmissible just because it is hearsay in our proceedings. However there may be circumstances in which it would not be fair to admit it, for example where it is the sole and decisive evidence in respect of a serious charge and it isn't 'demonstrably reliable' and not capable of being tested.¹¹

Hearsay statements will usually carry less weight than oral evidence because it cannot be tested. Hearsay evidence may also be inadmissible where the weight which could be given to it in the circumstances of the case is zero, even where there is other evidence that could 'corroborate' (or support) it.¹² Although it's not possible to provide a complete list of situations where this could happen, one example is where the evidence of a crucial witness is hearsay, and the fact that the nurse, midwife or nursing associate can't challenge it is so unfair that nothing else in the hearing process can avoid the unfairness.

No case to answer

There may be situations where, at the close of our case, the nurse, midwife or nursing associate feels that we just haven't put forward enough evidence to mean they still have a case to answer.

There will be no case for a nurse, midwife or nursing associate to answer where, at the close of our case, there is:

1. no evidence
2. some evidence, but evidence which, when taken at its highest, could not properly result in a fact being found proved against the nurse, midwife or nursing associate, or the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's fitness to practise being found to be impaired.

The question of whether there is a case to answer turns entirely on our evidence. Evidence which might form part of the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's case will not be taken in to account.

Where the strength or weakness of our evidence depends on the weight it should be given, a submission that there is no case to answer is likely to fail. That issue is best considered after all the evidence has been heard.¹³

When should panels resolve disputes regarding context

As mentioned above there will be times when a FtPC will need to resolve whether a disputed contextual factor was present or not, and make a factual finding about that.

This will only be necessary if the contextual factor would have a material impact on the outcome of the case. For more information about our approach to context please see our guidance on taking account of context.

So at what stage of a hearing should a panel resolve whether a contextual factor is present? This is likely to be something that panels will need to decide on a case-by-case basis, and panels will need to be flexible in their approach.

Panels have a wide discretion under our rules to determine how a hearing is conducted, and they will need to use that discretion to decide when they think the dispute should be resolved.¹⁴

In some circumstances they might decide it is appropriate to determine the issue at the facts stage, or alternatively they may decide that it is more appropriate to decide the issue at the impairment stage. The decision on when to resolve a disputed contextual factor could depend on when the contextual factor is raised during a hearing.

Prior to the hearing, we'll have reviewed the case and tried to work with the nurse, midwife or nursing associate to clarify the important issues in the case. The case presenter should usually be able to assist the panel with whether a material contextual factor is in dispute and the most appropriate point to resolve it.

When the panel does resolve a dispute in relation to context they will need to make it clear in their reasons what the contextual factor was that they resolved, and how they reached their decision.

Further evidence

Our overarching objective is the protection of the public. Because of this, the panel has a responsibility to ask us to obtain further evidence if they are concerned that there are gaps in the evidence which will prevent them from properly performing their function.¹⁵

Making decisions on sexual misconduct

Reference: DMA-7 Last Updated: 27/02/2024

When making decisions in cases about sexual misconduct, panels should be mindful of the myths and stereotypes surrounding rape and other forms of sexual misconduct. Panels should take account of the CPS guidance in this area and should ensure that their reasoning is not influenced by these common myths and stereotypes.

Making decisions on dishonesty charges and the professional duty of candour

Dishonesty and inferences

When making decisions on charges involving dishonesty, panels of the Fitness to Practise Committee must decide whether or not the conduct took place, and if so, what was the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's state of mind at the time.¹

Any dispute over whether a nurse, midwife or nursing associate behaved dishonestly means that the panel's findings will depend on what conclusions they can draw about the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's state of mind from the basic facts.

To help the panel focus on the central issues and be able to express this in their reasoning, it needs to consider the following:

- what the nurse, midwife or nursing associate knew or believed about what they were doing, the background circumstances, and any expectations of them at the time
- whether the panel considers that the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's actions were dishonest, or
- whether there is evidence of alternative explanations, and which is more likely.

How we approach evidence about a nurse, midwife or nursing associate's state of mind

The panel will need to consider a number of factors when making decisions about a nurse, midwife or nursing associate's state of mind when they did or said something which we say is dishonest or kept silent about something which we say is dishonest².

What the panel must consider to reach its decision

As part of drawing conclusions about the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's state of mind, the panel must consider what the evidence says about the background facts or circumstances, and what the nurse, midwife or nursing associate knew or believed about what they were doing.³

There may be evidence about what was expected of the nurse, midwife or nursing associate in the particular circumstances.

This doesn't mean that the panel should hear evidence about the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's own standards of honesty or their own beliefs about what the prevailing standards of honesty in society are. This is not relevant to deciding whether or not the nurse or midwife behaved dishonestly.⁴

The question of what is honest or dishonest in a particular set of circumstances, is a question for the panel to determine by applying what it understands the standards of ordinary, decent people to be.

The law assumes that people from all walks of life can easily recognise dishonesty when they see it⁵, and that in most situations it is not difficult to identify how an honest person would behave.⁶

It is important that the panel considers whether there is an alternative explanation for the nurse, midwife or nursing associate's conduct, which points away from them having behaved dishonestly.⁷ It can be useful to ask whether their mind was engaged with what they were doing, or could they simply have made an innocent or careless mistake?

The panel must address this question by identifying evidence for any other explanations, not by speculating.

As a regulator, the burden and standard of proof mean that, for an allegation to be proved, we have to satisfy the panel that it is more likely than not, that it happened.

In a case about dishonesty, where there is evidence of different explanations for why the nurse, midwife or nursing associate might have done something, the question is which explanation is more likely?

The professional duty of candour

Breaches of the professional duty of candour are amongst the most serious category of concerns. Within our guidance on seriousness, we list breaches of the professional duty of candour as serious concerns which are more difficult to put right. This means that we will be keen to hear from the nurse, midwife or nursing associate about any reflections and opportunities to show insight because restrictive regulatory action is likely to be necessary when concerns of this nature aren't put right.

Although a breach of the duty of candour can amount to dishonesty, there are circumstances where there could be a breach which isn't dishonest. An example of this could be someone telling a colleague not to report an error that had occurred. We always regard breaches of the duty of candour as very serious, whether or not they are also dishonest.

To comply with the professional duty, nurses, midwives or nursing associates must:

- Be honest, open and truthful in all their dealings with patients and the public.
- Never allow organisational or personal interests to outweigh the duty to be honest, open and truthful.
- Act with integrity and give a constructive and honest response to anyone who complains about the care they have received.
- Act without delay and raise concerns if they experience problems that prevent them from working within the Code. Also act without delay and raise concerns if they or a colleague, or any other problems in the care environment, are putting patients at risk of harm. 'Doing nothing' and failing to report concerns is unacceptable.
- Apologise and explain fully and promptly what has happened and the likely effects if someone in their care has suffered harm for any reason. 'Near misses', where a nurse's, midwife's or nursing associate's act or omission puts a patient at risk of harm, must also be escalated as a point of concern.
- Cooperate with internal and external investigations.

We wouldn't usually refer specifically to breaches of the duty of candour as part of the misconduct charges. Instead we would expect the fact that the misconduct charged amounts to a breach of the duty of candour to be taken into account by a panel when considering misconduct, impairment and sanction when a case reaches those stages of a hearing.

2 Under the professional duty of candour, nurses and midwives must be open and honest with patients when something that goes wrong with their treatment that could cause harm or distress. This means that nurses, midwives or nursing associates must tell the patient (or, where appropriate, the patient's advocate, carer or family) when something has gone wrong. Keeping silent when something has gone wrong is a breach of this professional duty.

Agreed removal at hearings

Reference: DMA-9 Last Updated: 24/04/2023

Nurses, midwives or nursing associates can apply for agreed removal during a hearing before the Fitness to Practise Committee. In considering the application, the Assistant Registrar will take into account the panel's views.

When will we consider a removal application during a hearing?

Nurses, midwives or nursing associates who are subject to fitness to practise proceedings can apply for removal from the register at any stage of the process.

When a nurse, midwife, or nursing associate applies for agreed removal during a substantive hearing, the panel will decide when the application for agreed removal should be considered. The panel will consider how best to minimise the disruption caused to the hearing. This will usually mean waiting until the end of the finding of facts or impairment stage of the hearing, unless there is an urgent reason for the application to be considered earlier. In making this decision, panels should balance the need for the application to be considered against the public interest in the regulator being able to operate effective hearings. In particular, inconvenience to witnesses should be avoided where possible.

When the panel considers that it is appropriate for the application for agreed removal to be considered, they will be invited to make any recommendation on whether or not the application for removal should be agreed. The application will then be considered by the Assistant Registrar, who will take any recommendation given by the panel into consideration as one of the factors relevant to their decision. If the Assistant Registrar agrees the application for removal, there will be no need for the panel hearing to resume (unless there is an interim order in place) and the professional will be removed from the register. If the Assistant Registrar does not agree the application, the panel hearing will resume at the point where it was adjourned.

Deciding on incorrect or fraudulent entry

Reference: DMA-10 Last Updated: 12/10/2018

When it considers an allegation of incorrect or fraudulent entry¹, the Investigating Committee's focus is on deciding whether it is more likely than not that our registration, renewal or readmission decision was made based on information that was incorrect or fraudulent.

The Investigating Committee will assess how the nurse, midwife or nursing associate was accepted onto, or remained on our register, in the first place, rather than assessing their current practice.

In doing this, it considers whether the information about the person's character, qualifications, practice hours or other entry requirements was correct at the time it was submitted.

Because the Committee's focus is the validity of the original registration, renewal or readmission decision, evidence about the person's current work or ability to provide care is unlikely to be relevant.

When making these decisions, the Investigating Committee should consider the guidance about incorrect or fraudulent entry allegations.

¹ Rule 5 of The Nursing and Midwifery Council (Fitness to Practise) Rules 2004 ('the Rules') sets out the procedure to be followed.
